— House Speaker Greg Stumbo says a new report on prescription drug having positive impact.

During the 2012 General Assembly, Stumbo was the chief sponsor a bill to tighten regulations on pain treatment clinics and to mandate universal participation by prescribers in the state prescription database. The so-called "pill mill bill" ultimately won approval during a special session immediately following the legisla-

On Wednesday, Stumbo-pointed to figures recently released by managed-care organization. Coventry-Cares, which shows a 22 percent drop in the supply of the five most commonly abused prescriptions over a three-month period, compared to a similar pe-fiod prior to the new law's implementation.

"While these numbers are only a snapshot of what's taking place as Kentucky continues to battle pain pills, it's certainly encouraging to know that there will be fewer pills that could find their way on to Kentucky's streets and into the hands of those who would abuse them," Stumbo said. "We are especially pleased to hear that a group helping to administer health care to Kentuckians reports that while usage is down, those who truly need these drugs are receiving them."

According to the numbers provided by CoventryCares, the supply of Percoet, Vicodin, Oxycontin, Fentanyl and Opana had dropped from more than 1.3 million days worth to just over 1.1 million.

Opana showed the steepest decline, at over 32 percent.

"I understand that one-report does not make a trend," Stumbo said. "However, when it comes to the war against prescription drug abuse, you have to be encouraged by any good news. I'd say an organization reporting a 22 percent drop in commonly abused pills would definitely fall under 'good news."

An FDA advisory panel raised hopes last week that the next prescription drug abuse problem never happens.

The panel voted overwhelmingly against approving a new painkiller in development, Zohydro, which is a pure form of hydrocodone said to be 10 times more powerful than Vicodin.

Most of the 400 painkillers currently available in the United States contain a powerful narcotic, such as hydrocodone or oxycodone, mixed with a less powerful drug, such as acetaminophen or ibuprofen. Zohydro would be the first pure formulation of hydrocodore, if it were to be approved to the proposed new formulation of hydrocodore, if it were to be approved to the concerns we have heard from local health professionals, law enforcement officers and government officials, since we began reporting on the proposed new drug 11 months ago. Those we talked to express worries that the new drug would be even more addictive than what is currently available, and would to higher rates over abuse and death.

Those worries are likely well founded. Studies have shown that pure forms of oxycodone have a 3-to-4 times greater rate of abuse than medications like. Oxycontin, which combine oxycodone with other, less powerful medicines.

However, last Friday's vote is not the end of the line for Zohydro. The FDA is not expected to finish less powerful medicines.

However, last Friday's vote is not the end of the line for Zohydro. The FDA is not expected to finish its review of the drug until March 1, and the agency could still give it approval, although the panel's vote makes it less likely.

Until that time, it is up to consumers, officials and other interested parties to continue to make their concerns about a potentially dangerous new drug known.

Our health care system is still sick

Unlike other wealthy countries, our those at the top to receive top-notch

If you're lucky enough to obtain coverage in the first place, you're vie for our business with inadequate expires or the cost of your care exceeds policy limits? Tough luck.

Meanwhile, the lucky among us

Dear Parker Brothers, I am a satisfied customer who has a couple of queries regarding your wonderful, ageless classic Monopoly.

He and yet when I think back I can't

One time I almost finished a game when I was a kid, but my older brother.

Dustin, flipped the game board off the kitchen table. I'm not sure if that has ever happened to you, but essentially it's a game-ender. I mean, the feel it violates the spirit of the game.

I notice on the side of the box it reads the game pieces are a choking/ safety hazard for children five and under. This might seem like a random question but does that mean I won't choke on one if I intentionally consume one? Because I have to leve with you. I'm fairly certain I could eat the thimble and handlesselve unamolessfully. That would be the one of the could eat if I had to, like, if I was forced at guipoint to eat one of the 12 Monopoly pieces. The howitzer and the man on horseback are way too pointy to risk it with.

Another question I had is the reason I am writing. The other night my beautiful, brand-new wife. Christine, and I reached an unpleasant impasse. She wanted to be the racecar. Heck, I bet if you polled the country everybody would want to be the racecar. Nobody voluntarily picks the wheelbarrow, do the?

Long story short we didn't know how to settle the racecar atlemate. Christine politely suggested a coin dinew a tantrum, unwilling to back.

Stop acting so childish," I murmured:

How should these petty squabbles be handled? [That is to say, short of a knife figit or a bare-knuckled brawl who gets first dibs on the racecar?

Christine foolishly maintains I show a little chivalry. I say that in a fast-dealing property trading game that promotes faulty banking methods and encourages negligent lending practices there is no such thing as chivalry.

She claims I should pick another game plece and move on I told her that was an easy sentiment to possess. She wasn't the one who forked over $44.95 for Monopoly (The Godfather Bditton), and I was.

So does the owner of the game it self carry any special privilege with it? The rules fail to address this crucial issue. In your opinion should I or should I not get first diba?

Buther complicating this matter is the fact that, while I did purchase the board game, it was a birthday present to Christine. We debated for a half-hour over this.

She is right. I did buy that particular version of Monopoly as a present for her, but I didn't really bisy it for her, but I didn't neally bisy it for her, but I didn't neally bisy it for her, but I didn't neally bisy it for her, but I didn't really bisy it for her, but I didn't neally bisy it for her her her her he

"I am very excited to align myself with Mars Race Cars and I can't wait to get behind the wheel of a MB Customs car next year," Kinzer commented. "We have spent a great deal of time over the phone and in person with them over the last week or so and I am very comfortable that this is the direction that we need to go for 2013. Me and Jimmy (Mars) think the same way about a lot of things and he has committed to pro-

You can't argue with the amount of success that Jimmy and Brian (Birkhofer) have had over the past five years, along with some of the other guys that drive their stuff. I look forward to working a losely with them and having a great 2013 season."

The feeling is mutual from Mars Race Cars.

'Octaman'

Tom Doty Times Colum

A team of tree-hugging scientists, funded by an oil man, cross swords with a mutated Octa-beast in this hom-

Octaman is camped out in their Winnebago. A guinight ensues and,sadly, Octaman didn't bring one. A wooden effigy of the Octa-dude is tossed on his watery grave and we are outta here.

You really want to like this movie. It has a sound message about recycling and taking care of the earth and is an homage to my favorite monster movie of all time (which gave this column its name). It was even written and directed by Harry Essex, who co-wrote the script for "The Creature from the Black Lagoon." The monster suit was even co-built by the great Rick Baker, who went on to create Oscar winning make-up for some far-out flicks.

No can do, though, because this is slow and dull. It only comes to half-life when the Octa-guy is on screen, and that isn't nearly enough.

The science of it is also goofy. A minor complaint, but do we really believe that a circle of fire in open space will suck all of the oxygen away?

Good for a laugh, but I am still waiting for a big budget remake of my favorite lagoon monster, and this doesn't even come close.

It whipped him like cake batter with its tentacles before putting him down with 'its finishing move — the two-tentacle chokehold (a move so lethal it is even forbidden in steel cage matches). Turns out the natives tell stories about an Octaman (it's a great theme for making trinkets for the Gringos) and their drawings match what crawled out of the water.

The group takes their Winnebago to the area where the legend hangs out and they immediately fall afoul of it. They actually play cat and mouse with it for quite awhile. The group will go out in a boat while Octaman calls on those left behind at the camp. It will pop up and scare the boaters and then go back to the camp to continue waving its Octa-arms at people like a crazed traffic cop.

Eventually the party decides this critter is too tough to tangle with, and they leave the valley, only to find their path blocked by a fallen tree. Octaman then gets them to chase him into a cave, where he strands them by causing a rockslide. They eventually crawl out and head back to find that Rental Central
