SURGEON GENERAL WARNS THAT PLAGUES MAY SWEEP INDUSTRIAL AREAS OF U. S.

A warning that plagues may sweep the densely populated industrial areas of the United States unless precautionary measures are taken was sounded this week by Surgeon General Thomas Parran.

The head of the United States Public Health Service told the annual conference of state and territorial officers:

"Lest we be lulled into complacency by accomplishments, let me sound a note of warning in respect to possible outbreaks of plague, typhus fever, yellow fever and smallpox."

Typhus fever and plague have been spreading eastward from the Pacific Coast along rats, ground squirrels and other rodents, Dr. Parran said, and the bites of the fleas which infest them may transmit the disease to human beings.

The dread maladies have been found in most of the Pacific and Rocky Mountain states and in some Plains states and Southern states.

"The incidence of human typhus ever seems to be increasing within these states and the disease is extending to surrounding territory," Dr. Parran added.

Typhus fever and plague were the scourge of the middle ages and occurred in epidemics in the United States as late as 1900.

For many years this country "has escaped the ravages of yellow fever" because of strict quarantine measures, the Surgeon General said, but since the disease is still prevalent in South America and because of rapid airplane transportation between the North and South American republics a real danger exists.

The mosquitoes which transmit the disease are common in the United States and, in addition, persons who contract yellow fever may reach the interior of the United States by airplane before the infection becomes apparent.

The Public Health Service early this year reported several minor outbreaks of smallpox, Dr. Parran said, and "it is necessary again to call attention to the high proportion of people who failed to be vaccinated against the disease."

TIDBITS OF KENTUCKY FOLKLORE

IN THE DAYS OF THE SAWMILL

Kentucky was once a great lumber state; wanton destruction of our forests has about brought to an end any likelihood of our seeing any return of earlier conditions, but the preservation of our timber in state and national reserves and parks will insure to our descendants a supply of timber that will partially serve their needs. Since I lived in the Jackson Purchase, the "last west" of Kentucky, I knew as a boy much of the tradition of lumbering and its allied industries. Here and there in the state the same conditions still exist in a small way.

The sawmill literally cut a swath across our time. In almost every community there formerly existed one or more mills, located, usually, in the actual woods to be ruined. To them were hauled the most promising logs; the others were brought together in heaps at log-rollings and reduced to ashes. Coarse, rough lumber was sawed out to be used in building houses, barns and fences. Yellow poplar, our most distinctive timber, suffered soonest, as lumber of this type was easily worked and relatively light. The various oaks suffered next, with the numerous kinds trailing. The mill was a great rendezvous for the neighborhood, as it was one of the few mechanical things we knew. Huge piles of sawdust and rotting scantlings often were the only remnants of gigantic forests.

had dragged them on a "lizard," a V-shaped slide that held up one end of the log, was a thing of note in any neighborhood. More attractive still was the skill of the rattsman, who had piloted his collection of valuable logs down some treacherous creek or river in midwinter and had lived thru it all, little the worse for wear. Then it was great sport to visit the mill and see the huge logs dismembered, to see the great pile of sawdust, to smell the newly sawed wood. Local youths longed to be able to run the saw carriage, to try their skill at sawing planks of a certain thickness. In fact, the man who could do this work was almost as much envied as the man who cut bundles at wheat-threshing time.

All the earlier mills were run by water power. Usually there would be, at the really established mills rather than at those in the woods, other things, like a grist mill or even a cotton gin. So when we went with a log wagon, drawn by oxen, to the old mill, we were likely to see most of the machinery of a whole neighborhood.

Floyd Fishermen Fined in Pike County Court

S. C. Kinzer and J. H. Howell, both of Allen, paid fines of $15 and costs each in Pike county court at Pikeville last week for fishing out of season. The two men, using snares were arrested a short time before their guilty pleas were entered by Game Warden J. C. Williamson, on Sheiby Creek.

Williamson was able to make the arrest because he had been informed of the violation by telephone by a farmer living in the community, who asked that his name be withheld.

An old-time church supper was given at Mr. and Mrs. Alex Davis' home Saturday night for the purpose of raising money to erect a Methodist Church building here. It was sponsored by the Ladies' Aid.

Mr. and Mrs. Tom Layne have returned home from Ironton, O., where she underwent an operation for cancer. She is improving nicely.

Those who attended the high school day at Richmond, May 3, from Betsy Layne were: Ray Stratton, Elasitter Thacker, Eugene Bostley, Burton Miller, Victor Walters, Glenn Whitt, Gerald Hunter, Carl Robinette, Ray Hamilton, Bill Hamilton, D. a swell job for your town and the state of Kentucky.

The State Game and Fish Commission received $213,489.66 from hunting and fishing licenses and federal funds last year.

Bill May, Agriculture Commissioner, has been appointed to serve three months as a collaborator of the Federal Agriculture Adjustment Administration. The state commissioners named, meet in Washington to help in formulating policies. Bill is just 22 years old, but is gaining national recognition for his work in Kentucky.

The State Fair board met last week and appointed John Necomb manager of the horse show. Indications point to a big state fair this year, with grand circuit harness racing.

POISONER AT WORK

Prestonsburg's dog-poisoner had himself a "large" time of it. He must have rubbed his hands to the quick as he watched his dumb, trusting victims bolting down his lethal potions with the food he had set for them.

Sure, there are too many dogs roaming the streets of Prestonsburg. But what about the children roaming the streets? What about too many children being housed in one hut? Would you want to poison the tots, just because they happen to exist miserably and are not what you might call assets to their community?

Some might want to, at that—but not anybody with a heart. Hunger, as many humans poignantly know these days, is one of the most compelling of urges. To take advantage of this natural drive and to leave poisoned food for a hungry, unthinking animal is, to our way of thinking, little short of murder.

If the dog-poisoner wants to kill more dogs, there are several citizens here who will issue him a cordial invitation to take a shot in the open at their dogs. They'd like to have him try it, so that they could get in a shot or two themselves.

MIX-UP

The $275 beverage cooler was owned by Henry Porter. The bus was owned by the Floyd County Board of Education, and Mr. Porter's son Herman is a member of the Board. Yes, it sounds mixed up—and it was. The fact of the matter is, it was quite a mess when school bus and beverage cooler met, a short distance above Allen Monday afternoon. The cooler fell from the truck directly into the path of the bus, and was a complete loss.
